

Title: UNPOPULAR OPINION: use the tools you are trained with, and don't sweat the big stuff; a call for being forklift certified.

Who knows if yall will see this. But I think its worth standing on a soap box for.

Would you let a new guy run a forklift day one, no experience? Probably not. You'd get him to do the things that are expected to be done regarding his experience. Whether this means moving boxes, taking inventory, or assisting skilled workers. As he gains more experience, that's when you ask if he wants to get more certifications, and add more value to himself.

This is how we as the GME community should view options. It's a tool, that requires training or knowledge to use, but shouldn't be shunned.

Instead, we as a community should be viewing options as something NOT expected for the average ape. If you are "forklift certified", bless you my guy, we need help moving things to top shelf. But it isn't worth the grueling work to do it without if we don't have to.

And of course, if you have no money you can spare, don't sweat the big stuff. We are all in this together, as a community.

For the rest of us (me included) we should try to learn how to drive the options "forklift", get certified, and assist the effort. I'd love to see a stickied and dumbled down apes-first-option post.

We may right now have the Trojan horse from hell for citadel being ignored because we're scared of the woodworking and carved skulls on the outside.

Disclaimer: no one should take financial advice from me. You are your own person! I belive in your choices, and only advocate sharing knowledge that should be shared. I have drs'd all my shares, voted way back when, and shared this magical journey since last January. I felt the lead ball drop when I saw the price dive to 40. I bought what I could. Every we used is to be read as a "royal we." I'm with yall, through and through.
