I've discussed this in other subs before, but now I'm going to be more specific with how I'm going to give the gift of knowledge. This whole fiasco we're witnessing in the stock market can be hard to comprehend for most people. They have a vague idea of some form of corruption, but that's where it ends. To help spread the word in a way that may help the recipient *want* to know more, I am going to buy my mother a share of GME for mother's day and my father a share of GME for father's day, since they're not too far off.

The gift will come with a caveat; they cannot sell until I do. Also, I hope owning something with such value will spark that interest into wanting to understand what's going on better. I know I typically don't proactively start investigating something unless I'm genuinely interested. Maybe this will be that catalyst for them? I'm fairly certain it will for my dad. As for my mom, it's a 50/50 shot but since they're still together I'll put the burden on pops.

To elaborate: This is money I would have spent on a card and some flowers, or a card and a tie, etc. Now it will be spent on a card and one share. Directions for DRS will be included, of course, as well with the expectation they will call with any questions.

Thoughts?
