There was a post earlier on SS that explains why the success of the company is a vital key to this. Here is an example that illustrates the importance of the company having a product. The stock split pumped it, but without the follow through, we are watching the dump. Tesla fan boys aware of shorting issues as Musk highlights it in interviews, yet no DRS.

Start here:

Elon notoriously over promises.

Tesla also has split:

Tesla (TSLA) has 1 split in our Tesla stock split history database. The split for TSLA took place on August 31, 2020. This was a 5 for 1 split

Flashback to August 2020:

The month began with the electric car company reporting second-quarter earnings and Musk apologizing for some recent ill-advised outbursts. But a week later, the Tesla and SpaceX founder took to the social media platform to announce that he wanted to take the company private.

It set off a media firestorm that consumed the business news cycle for weeks. But near the end of August, Musk had reversed his position on going private

I'm 2020, the first video shows a clip that says,

"Extremely confident in full autonomy and releasing it to the Tesla customer base by next year".

It's 2022, I won't lie Tesla's are dope. Or so I've been told. But regardless there is no Tesla fleet of autonomous robo taxis.

We are seeing new players like Waymo, GM cruise, Uber, Aurora that are entering the space and creating more diversification among investors in the space.

This is where investor support falters as there are other options and promises have not become actions.

The split was a pump. But the product is the foundation you need to build.

GameStop marketplace, organic change and adoption, new system can contend with old system. Then BOOM. It's always tomorrow until it's today. Good luck RC, show us actions and we'll stick around for as long as that infinity pool stays wet.
