I don't mean Citadel, but Ken Griffin privately. It'd be an easy way for him to play both sides. Citadel isn't using his own money after all, when GME takes off, he can just walk away, and let it go bankrupt. But if he has a bunch of shares of his own, then he gets to come along with all the other owners when the price increases by a few orders of magnitude.

And if it doesn't take off (yes, I know, but hypothetically) he's just lost whatever his minor investment was, but he then gets to point to how well Citadel did shorting it to get more investors and take bonuses on that side of things.

Sure, it's not ethical, but what difference does that make to him? Is there any way to confirm or deny this theory?
