My fellow apes, just some thoughts and considerations from an Euro ape.

I must admit at first, I got into this game (pun intended) in order to me get some extra bucks. I'm just a small holder and I was all hyped but my holding turned red quite fast. It got me to get nervous and checking my phone more and more. As days turned into weeks and weeks into months however, I got used to seeing the red figure and getting used to it. The last couple of months, I started to just take a step back and started to really realize how incredibly manipulated this stock (and other meme stocks) is. It made me sick to see how the rich (represented by the HF's) screw over the ordinary people. They do not care, at all. They in it to make money, one way or the other. They can adjust the price to what they want, when they want. It's sickening and will not be stopped by officials.

The past few weeks (before the run up), I've finally reached zen mode, it took a long time, but I've reached it and I'm delighted. How do I know I'm really zen? Because I've seen green for a very little while but it did not make me happy, really not a single moment. I wasn't relieved, wasn't happy, I was zen. I don't know how much time it takes for others, or how much information you need to digest to come to realize, that this is an actual epic fight against one of the seven sins: greed. I hold and I'll keep holding, I don't care about green or a number. I hold until the actual phrase is met: Power to the people.

Being green should NOT make you happy. Print that in your mind, read, educate and do what feels right until we reach: Power to the people. F*ck the greedy HF's.

With that said, I really wonder how the GME dividend will work out. And there arise some questions which this great community might have the answer to, or thoughts on.

So I believe that Ryan does want to screw the HF and the stock dividend is the way to go, but it leaves me with questions.

1. If you issue stock dividend, this automatically leads to a stock count right? Brokers need to give the div which they receive from GameStop and dividend on shorted stock needs to be arranged by the shorting party (being the HF). So shitadel would need to buy they stock dividend from GME in order to buy and supply the dividend. The total of dividend stock received by the brokers plus bought by the shorting party would automatically lead to a count in my opinion. So my question here is twofold:

1. is this an automatic stock count since stock holders (we) need to receive dividend. If we own the float twice or x times, it would become visible instantly?

2. HF would need to buy from GameStop in order to be able to give the stock dividend to us. Would that mean that GameStop would decide upon the share price the HF have to pay?

2. Power to the people; again, just a small holder here. Let's say it's a 3:1 or even a 7:4:1 split. You'd need multiple shares to be able to receive a complete stock as a dividend. I'm not sure what the dividend percentage will be, but let's say it's low. Most small holders would only be entitled to fractional shares. My broker does not support that and I don't mind, I'm zen and just want power to the people. But my question is, is it known how many brokers support fractional shares? If your broker does not support it, you'll probably receive nothing. The more there are, the more we hurt the HF. With that said, GameStop has quite the war chest. How could and devastating would the following be: 7 4 1 shares and 1 share for a one time dividend. All the current shareholders would receive an extra share, which would be both a massive reward for the share holders and both be a massive blow to the HF's who'd have to buy a massive amount of shares, just for us.

TLDR:

1. Is a stock count automatically done when you issue a stock dividend?
2. How many brokers support fractional shares?
3. Become Zen, it's great.
