I was researching Computershare and came across their updated FAQ page in which this question and answer was posed:

Is there a limit to the value of a transaction that I can undertake using your online services?

For GameStop stock we have now removed the previous estimated sales proceeds limit of $1 million for web-based orders. GameStop shareholders can now undertake transactions up to an estimated sales proceeds limit of $9,999,999 million through our online services. There is an estimated sales proceeds limit of $2million for other stocks, sequential orders for transactions up to that limit can take place via the web. Please note that these figures relate to the estimated value of the transaction (the price of shares multiplied by the number of shares) rather than the individual share price.

I'm a smooth brain and was wondering if anyone could explain the sales proceeds portion to me? It says it has been increased to $9,999,999 for a shares proceeds limit. Is that per transaction or does that limit me for all shares sold online? I am just curious to how this works. I have included the link to the updated FAQ page for reference. Thank you!
