I'm not a technical wizard. I hardly know more than the basics of trading, or the basics of anything, really. I'm a new retail investor, but I do specialize in one thing.

Psychology.

Something I've seen is during every dip that's ever been, there's always negativity, especially on WSB.

My portfolio went down from 5k to almost less than 1k. I lost nearly 2k of my initial investment, still with more left to lose. This was before DRS was brought to public attention.

I was panicking. I can't believe I threw away so much money, money that I got so lucky to have I just threw in a shredder.

But it wasn't over until I sold.

I held on, when my teachers and friends laughed and said how GME crashed, and nobody was talking about it.

I ignored it and tuned it out, because I was too late to save my investment.

Then, the price of GME went up to over 400 a share a couple months later.

I was up to 10k. I was flabbergasted, but didn't sell, thinking that it would go up further.

Then everything crashed and tumbled, and now everyone, when WSB, the subreddit that was almost exclusively GME, has separated their GME talk into r/GME and r/superstonk among others.

But the last crash, everyone mocked anyone who was still holding, telling them that they wasted their time and how they got out with the money once they could.

But.

BUT.

This has happened before.

I'm not saying we may ever see GME go up to that price again, and I'm not saying it'll ever go down and never pop back up.

But please, manage your savings. If MOSS is truly capable of happening and you are genuinely bending your well being of getting a good paycheck out of this, please, put yourself at ease. A lot of people who are angry and mocking you are people that are sour that they lost a shot ton of money, or never understood why people believed in GME in the first place.

Transferring wealth and changing their lives for things such as cancer, sucky jobs, poverty, or even just to help their family or loved ones.

Don't give up, but don't get reckless. If you're checking your phone hundreds of times a day to panic over stock prices, and worrying about the money you put into GME, consider cutting a little bit out just for you to have in case of the worst. If more details come out about how this can definitely still make it or definitely pop, replan from there. Don't make yourself poor, in poverty, or upset over money that you can't ever get back for an amount that will cripple you. Hold on to your dreams while saving your finances that can help you not make lifelong financial decisions that can cripple you, especially with inflation going on.

Take a deep breath, and make an informed, realistic decision until you're putting only as much money on the line that you can stand losing.

I wish all of you love and support, message me if you need help, I'll respond if I can, but I don't know anything about detailed information or stock action, and maybe that was my first fault.
