I've already posted this before...

I think we have all come far enough as Apes, Appettes, and baby Apes to see that the media has a firm grasp of the narrative being written about this saga.

As we go day to day we have read DD, seen graphs and charts, been hopeful about TA. As all of you, I have hope and hold onto my position but one narrative has been a constant drone. They hire experts that ring the knell of GME, they have basement dwellers give testament of losing everything on Stonks. They have lawyers and attorneys ready to jump on anyone who claims to give financial advise. DFV has had to go into hiding because he made calculated bets that paid off. He is just like you and I. That is because he figured out their system, the system he had to explain his case in front of Congress. They have new words for people like him who allegedly elicit "Gameification".

Imagine the power the SHF have, imagine the power market makers, and banks, when they can single out one retail investor that "Won". One person who did his DD and came out ahead. The repercussions of his stake has ressonated within the financial world and set a new precedence for all of retail. He shook Wall Street enough to have the entire system shut off for a day. They had to rally and figure out what unforeseen beast he awoken.

What DFV awoke was years and years of corruption in wallstreet. 401ks, Roth IRAs, and retirement plans being invested by corrupt brokers. People struggling and barely making ends meet seeing this problem and wanting to STOP the GAME. The spark he lit is an ember that has lit a flame in the hearts of people around the world. He is dead in this story but he dropped a torch. That torch we have all picked up and kindled. We all tell the stories about that one guy who isn't a cat. Who YOLOed his entire portfolio because he was confident in the outcome.

This rags to riches story is poison to the people who operate the monetary system. They need us all fighting amongst each other and pointing fingers. Why??? Mainly, because it's their system and they have relied on us to play our parts as pawns in the system. The key figures in this industry have been playing this game so long without risk they became complacent.

He gave us ab inside, and we all kindle that flame. Don't let this flame die out.
