I often have something valuable to add and have been following along since April, but because my Karma is still only in the 800s, I can't comment or participate in the other sub. I am an attorney and at times, haven't wanted to contribute or correct things, but karma requirements are censoring my ability to participate. I find it frustrating to be honest. I am an honest, hard working ape who doesn't know how to make memes that will land me karma. Oh well. Important points like: until you are a DRS registered SH, GameStop owes you no duties. Once you are an official SH, the Board owes you a fiduciary duty to protect your investments. You have a right to demand action by the Board of Directors to take action on something injuring the company or share value - it's called a written demand for action on the Board of Directors - and they are required to act or respond, and if they fail to act, the shareholders then have the right to bring a shareholder derivative action on behalf of the Board of Directors to take action. But only if you are a registered SH, hence the importance of DRS. No fiduciary duty owed to non-registered SHs. My point being, the karma requirements prevent people from contributing valuable content in favor of those who want to post the same tired memes over and over again.

This whole DRS thing has been so frustrating, so much misinformation circulating, and people acting like it came out of the woodwork but it has been a regularly recurring topic of discussion ever since February before getting snuffed out. I can't imagine how frustrating it has been for you especially.
