Let's say that I was an chairman of the board of a publicly traded company and not permitted to discuss that company in any way because it could be construed manipulating share price? How might one be able to get around that?

Could you invest in a company that you weren't involved in that had identical issues? Could you post information about that company as a shareholder without any care in the world? I sure hope so, because we all do that every single day...

Wonder if we start seeing a lot of "definitely not talking about GameStop but this other company I own shares in" tweets?
