First time posting here, but HODLing GME since January '21, so bear with me...

What if Ryan Cohen and the gang assigned a specific identifier using Blockchain technology (via NTFs) to each and every single share that was distributed as part of the splividend. That would allow them to track where each and every single fucking one of them went (and didn't go) after it was issued.

Might be an interesting way to prove beyond a doubt that those shares never made it to the right holders of record.

Just a thought. Discuss.
