I'd ideally post this in the ss sub but I'm not regarded enough to go there, so hopefully those there will see this here.

I may be asked to write an article for The Conversation - a media outlet that takes academic + journalistic stories and publishes them - on the rise of ss as a resource for quality, rapid deep dives and due diligence into the doings and machinations of the SHFs, MMs and others. I'm not covering the GME issue directly as it's legally perilous, and anyway we're just individuals who like a stock, but what of the core DD would you refer to as exemplars of high quality investigative journalism, which are outstanding pieces of high quality reasoning even if not all parts are yet factually backed up (and, to give balance, are there e.g.s of some less good work - I think the purchase of baby towels may be one, though that was never DD and more hopium).
