A year ago today, numerous numbers of brokers collaborated by disabling the 'Buy' button of GME (& a small number of other stocks) with the ultimate goal of stopping the stock price from increasing. They succeed. Citing "regulatory requirements" and concerns about damaging the "integrity of the marketplace" and the "clearing system" remains their claim for restricting the buying of these so-called 'Meme' stocks.

In truth, they needed to save their selves from financially going order, as like us they could see Wall Street's disproportionate 'Short' position on the retail market as Hedge Fund companies continue to abuse their unethical tactic of blitzing a company (and/or sector) with such an enormous amount of 'Puts' in order to bring the price down. Together with a campaign of distorting the media with deceptive and fake news, most genuine investors begin selling their declining positions which coherently intensifies the decrease of the stock price and fatefully awarding the Hedge Fund companies with their ill-gotten gains/profits (like taking candy from a toddler).

GME however was different. Whether it was the positive future fundamentals of the company, the moral grounds of switching off the buy button, the potential of a short squeeze, or simply nostalgia for the gaming industry, investors did something extraordinary by holding the stock whilst it was declining and have continued to purchase more and more ever since.

Wall Street found themselves vulnerable, the Hedge Funds method of tanking the price was not working as this toddler was not giving up their candy. So, they resorted to a year long campaign of releasing false news, shorting borrowed/artificial shares, shorting the ETF of the retail sector and artificially suppressing the price of GME through the dark pools (a series of loopholes & inefficiencies within the market place). The result is seen today, being people continue to hold and buy, but the price continues to drop.

But all this amplified price depression must be CLOSED at some point unless GME stock price falls below $1 (hedgies only way of not legally having to return the stock). Sure, they can continue to delay covering, but doing so means shorting more, which is costly, and ultimately adds more pressure to the substantial amount already pressing against that pressure valve, which will eventually blow (be it today or years to come).

Whether you are an 'x' holder or 'xxx,xxx' holder, you are playing an essential part in restructuring the stock market to make it more fairer and transparent. We have made SEC take notice and have started the demise of the self-absorbed Hedge Fund companies that are redundant in the future marketplace.

I'm so proud of all of us with what we have achieved, and for the future.

Buckle-Up xx
