I am wondering what the impact would be if all of the GME apes who have some concerns about being 100% DRS decide to transfer all of their shares to Computershare, just as a check to the legitimacy of the float. I know the end game is to leave them there (no cell, no sell etc), but what if those that had any concerns of the recent legitimacy of the split, and the allocation of shares tied to it, move them over, if not just short term, just to give the system a check? I feel like if there is a question of whether brokers are providing actual dividend shares, or just magically splitting non existent shares, a massive DRS of the split shares would shed some light. I'm not even asking apes to do this, but I am wondering what someone smarter than me thinks the outcome would be. Would it show if split shares are just appearing from nowhere? My brain is freshly waxed and buffed shiny smooth.
