The deal, generally:

1). The GME split/dividend (issuing of shares and change in price) will occur after the close of market on 7/21.

2). The record date is the 18th. but that doesn't mean if you buy between the 18th and the 21st (@market close) you won't get the additional shares. the 18th determines who gets or must distribute the shares. If you buy after the 18th but before the splividend, whoever sold you those shares will get them (since they owned them before the record date) and they should be automatically transferred to you

3) This means that if you buy at the current price range, there is no instance in which you will see the price drop by 1/4 and not get the shares (but see comment #4)

4) GameStop will distribute a number of shares that will reflect the real number (x3) that should be in existence. ComputerShare is the transfer agent used by GME, so the shares get distributed through them, and to DRSD shares first. After that, for street name shares that are all over the fucking place, we will see the shitshow that occurs when there are not enough shares issues by GameStop to give everyone their x3 shares. This remains to be seen how it will play out.

5) The point is, a normal stock market, the exact time when you buy the shares at the current price range with respect to the record date just determines if you get issued them directly or someone else does and transfers them to you. Once again, see comment #4.

Enjoy the splividend and the fuckery that will most likely ensue. There is a good chance this stonk is going to squeeze from having basically zero liquidity and a mess of naked shorts, not to mention high cost to borrow rates. But if it doesn't, take your balls out of your purse. Most things worthwhile in this world don't come easy, in particular when big money forces are against you. If GME not blowing its load this week drops you out of the fight, you were never meant to be here in the first place.

Personally, I love the stonk and see so much upside to this company it makes me want to take Ryan Cohen on the most expensive date I've ever treated anyone to.
