I caught a post last week about the SEC trying to slip "something" in the law/policy/rules similar to something they had tried to do twice before. I didn't note the post, thinking it'd be big news and I'd find it later; I can't find it. It was upvoted in a big way, but the news seems to have died down.

Could someone provide more information? Do we need to write the SEC and voice our opinions again?
