

Title: HF PUT play tomorrow, and starting to try and cover? Or just regular bears and day traders hedging?

I changed from a cash account to margin in order to exercise some non GME options and TDA fucking sold ALL my GME shares and rebought them. I should have just made a new account but I didn't think it would be an issue as TDA only loans your shares if you have a margin balance and after the options were exercised I'd immediately pay that off all in 5 minutes.

So I sold at the top that day knowing this dump was incoming and figured I might as well get the bonus of a lower average and some more shares since the shares were already sold once that day. I've been watching all week waiting for that 100 dollar mark and was going to pull the trigger at 101.xx today but held off for tomorrow after looking at the option numbers.

There are 10,175 open interest 100 strike, 3,212 at 95 strike, 2,878 at 90 strike on GME. All 0's in between those numbers until 85 which all have some open interest all the way down to 136,202 open interest at a whopping .50 cent strike. First, I find it weird these numbers just happen to be a nice round 16,265 but that could easily be a coincidence. However, I have a feeling tomorrow will be similar to today's movement. They will let the price run a little to collect more money and then dump it hard to force the low price sales.

Any thoughts?
