I still not have not received my dividend shares from Scotia iTrade and they tell me I never will because I gave up my right to be a stockholder of record when I called them to DRS transfer my GME shares on July 11th.

They referred to July 11th. as the "actionable date" and that made me become no longer the stockholder of record on July 18th. even though my GME shares were still with them.

July 11th., I called my broker Scotia iTrade to DRS transfer my GME shares.

July 18th., the stockholder of record date, my shares were still in my Scotia iTrade account.

July 20th., my Computershare traction history shows the shares were posted with them.

July 21st., my Scotia iTrade's transaction history shows the shares were "Delivered".

So, even though I was still the stockholder of record on July 18 with Scotia iTrade, they told me they don't owe me any shares due to reason stated above.

The shady part is, at first they tried to tell me that they go by the ex-div date, which was July 22nd., so Computershare owed me the shares.

But I told them that it even states explicitly on GameStop's corporate announcement page that stockholders of record on July 18th. are to receive the stock split in the form of a dividend.

That's when they came back with, oh, you're right. But because you called on July 11th. to initiate the DRS transfer, you have up your right to be the stockholder of record, and that's why we don't owe you anything.

I will email Scotia iTrade's compliance officer but I don't have high hopes with that. And I will contact, the CIRI, Canadian Investor Relations Institute, and the OSC, Ontario Securities Commission to see if I have any recourse and any further actions I can take.

But in the meantime, I thought I'd post about my situation here to see if anybody has experienced something similar and how it turned out for them.
