

Title: ■ ■ ■

Author: disoriented_llama

Created 2021-09-29 01:25:04 UTC

Permalink: /r/TheGloryHodl/comments/pxkr5q/_/

Url: /r/Superstonk/comments/pxko5l/weve_been_too_busy_laughing_at_citadels_twitter/

Linked Post Content:

They're changing the narrative, and shifting the crux of the issue to one they can try to fight.

They're focusing on the fact that they were there to complete the trades that everyone was making so that your trades didn't fail to execute. Which, sure, they managed their server loads and made sure that there wasn't a massive catastrophic number of failed trades, good for you citadel. You made a market.

They're ignoring the aspect of the fundamentally corrupt "how" they were able to do that without prices exploding even more than they did, by completing the trades without actually finding the shares for those trades, and the massive amount of phantom shares that their actions generated which they then failed to buy back.

Everyone is focusing on Vlad and Kenny talking, and maybe they legitimately didn't (because others did, under the guise of "normal communications") and their lawyers feel like they can prove that. Now they've got something they can latch onto and use to call Redditors crazy. Now they have something "verifiable" that they can take to conversations with investors while pointing at Reddit and saying "See! They don't know what they're talking about!" It's actually very smart defensive PR.

Don't let the narrative shift to who said what to who. There are way more shares than there should be because of the irresponsible trading practices of the market as a whole.