There's been a tremendous amount of quality DD that has been presented about GME, both for short term violent price runup potential and long term investment potential. Yo those who have created it...thank you.

At this point the dark figures that are in a significant bad position with their shorts are trying everything that they can possibly come up with in order to cause you, the unconventional investor who has bought into GME, to sell.

They can make the price go up to give hope, only to stab it back down.

They can identify dates where investors believe that something significant will happen with the price, and then make the action go the other way.

They can create their own dates and get them hyped through friendly accounts, knowing full well that they will make sure those dates are empty.

They can coordinate to make the borrow rates go up and then go down to further shake investors. After all they have done to this point, why believe that they cannot?

There are likely other things that they have done that I am missing here, and they likely have more plans to enact. Count on it.

The show here is the same as it has always been. Why do they keep doing these things at a significant financial cost if they weren't backed into a corner? This is all the proof that you should need that investors in GME are in a very good position.

Their money to do these things, to make it one more day, won't last forever. They've contained the situation thus far but as we know there are contagion events on the horizon, both known and unknown, which could make them lose control. Their hope is that you will lose control and sell first.

Anyone who thought that they would just roll over and give up without a long and drawn out fight was wrong. We have surrounded the Citadel, and their supplies will eventually run out.

Like a boa constrictor that has wrapped it's powerful coils around it's prey and is waiting for it to suffocate, time is our most powerful weapon. All we have to do is HODL and wait.
