I apologize if this has been covered, I haven't found answers to these two questions. They have been on my mind since the stock split/dividend filing was announced.

1) GME shareholder meeting first or second week of June, vote results announced. Assuming the split is approved, what kind of timeframe are we looking at after that? GME will announce the ex date, shorts will cover or they won't, the dividend happens and then SHTF. What is the typical timeframe from vote approval to ex date? I know nothing about this stock is typical but I'm just looking for some ballpark idea on when we might see some major ($2500+) price action. Between the shareholder meeting and ex date? After the ex date? How do you see this going down?

2) Now that I'm almost 100% DRS (350 shares, 200 more on the way this week) I'm concerned about computershare wiring the funds to my bank and how long it might stay in there while I get longer-term cash management set up. I have the ability to cover about 17.5 million in FDIC insured accounts within a day or two, through multiple single-member LLCs that I already have and 10 different banks in my city (70 insured accounts x 250k). I know about CDARS, but I don't necessarily want to invest in CDs or other financial instruments while the market collapse is happening. I don't really want to invest in stocks or crypto until the market crash levels out and we see what the future economy looks like with a potential currency reset. Where can I keep hundreds of millions of dollars where it's liquid at any given time?
