I'm a dedicated holder of GME but I've never considered the MOASS or even another squeeze a foregone conclusion. I've always viewed the situation as an asymmetric bet that to me appears worth the risk.

On the surface the situation with Apex is a disaster. IRAs account for a disproportionate number of shares, so unless a feasible and quickly actionable solution appears in the next couple days, it looks like Computershare will take at least an initial hit.

It's without a doubt a shot across the bow, but the thing is it's so obvious that it's exactly the type of shot across the bow some of us (only speaking for myself) need. I mean we are plummeting and having entered the new year, which is far longer than anyone imagined holding, there is a sense of fatigue for me.

But, this just feels like such an aggressive move against retail from a clearing house that took part in turning off the buy button last year. And there's only one obvious motive, to continue enabling fuckery. So it is in a sense encouraging, it's one of the moments in the last twelve months where it feels like the actual FUD, the legitimate fear uncertainty and doubt that exists in every investor, has lifted and you think, "I know what's going on here, I can see this situation clearly for the siege that it is, I know what they're doing and I'm certain of my investment".

HOLD.
