Hi apes, I hope to collect some good suggestions for a fellow Ape in need, even though they are unrelated to me but it's good to help fellow apes ain't it.

Issue:

Ape wants to own real GME shares to his name in Computershare, and/or (if possible) transfer existing shares from Fidelity to Computershare. However, existing compliance policy makes this an obstacle.

Allow me to summarize the story thus far:

>Ape works in a company that requires higher management approval to do trades. No crazy market maker or anything, just compliance reasons.

>Ape can only open accounts at certain brokerages that they had a feed from in order to download our data. Unfortunately, CS is not one of the 3 approved brokers.

>Ape's compliance team said approval may or may not be given next year. So, for now, ape can't register the shares as long as Ape works in that company. "

>Ape has TD and Fidelity account (so most probably US-based, I haven't asked) and is afraid of Fidelity not being able to get him tendies during MOASS.

At this point, I suggested the following ideas:

- * Do you have a trusted family member or close friend or close relative that could do a gift transfer from Computershare? For US persons it is possible to do a gift transfer of shares to a recipient party.

- * Alternatively you might need to get someone else to hold some shares on your behalf on a trust basis. I personally think that CS shares are the safest and most important at this point, and based on the DD so far, brokerages have the right to liquidate any positions for any reasons if it is a danger to their business.

Ape continued:

>Ape has a family member that could gift a share, but fears getting into trouble with Ape's company compliance, if Ape owns shares that were not reported.

>Ape thinks it's probably not allowed for someone to purchase shares on Ape's behalf either with all the rules and regulations (probably). The silver lining is, if it's allowed, Ape has got a friend that can be trusted with his life to do the on-behalf share purchase in CS.

Thank you for reading and I look forward to suggestions from the great wrinkly brained apes out there.
