Were to spend years cutting corners in order to maximize profits. Houses were poorly made, and missing key features to protect against wind damage. In fact, the builder would borrow certain hurricane supplies to show regulators they purchased them, but would actually sell them to another builder instead. After that ran out, they simply made fake invoices.

Then suppose some 50mph winds came through, and almost all the builder's houses would start to fall over. So people started suing. Hearing about the lawsuit, the company that lent the supplies decided they wanted their loaned materials back before the builder goes under.

Now the builder is broke, can't return the supplies, entire communities are homeless and ruined. All while the regulators try to point fingers elsewhere.

Now I ask you, would you blame Mother Nature for producing the wind in this situation?

GME is the wind.
