Just want to start off by saying I'm an xxx holder with 95% DRS shares and have been following multiple GME Reddit boards daily since the buy button was first turned off. Never been more invested in something or had this level of optimism towards a company/opportunity in my life. No putting the toothpaste back in the tube after this experience with Wall Street.

However, I went down the rabbit hole by going to the actual GameStop Reddit run by retail employees and am very disheartened by some of the stories of the treatment/wages they have received over the years up until this day (seemingly getting worse). I know GME boards have a huge boner for RC and have been supporting the company with their purchases. It's hard for me to believe corporate doesn't know about retail conditions, much less care if they've got bigger things on their plate (NFT marketplace, e-commerce, etc).

After scrolling through various posts, it seems almost no different than if I were an investor in Amazon, Kellogg's, Walmart, etc. All these evil corporate overlords and corporations that we're supposedly fighting against by holding, yet our company doesn't seem all that much different at the root level based on retail employee experiences.

My main question as shareholders is how can GameStop be held accountable to bring change at the retail employee root level? Is this something fixed post-MOASS while retail workers continue to bear the brunt?

Apologies if this has been brought up before and I missed some news on how things will change for retail employees. Not a skill by any means either. Just an investor that wants to know the people with feet on the ground will be compensated and treated accordingly with the turnaround the company is supposed to be making. Thanks.

Edit: As suggested by a couple posters, you can reach out to GameStop investor relations here if you are concerned. Sent an email and will see how it goes. Any additional tips to reach out are appreciated as well: <https://investor.gamestop.com/contact-us>
