I wouldn't expect anyone to care, but I've been a militant of gme stock since 2020, yeah I actually made some money back in those days, but I also doubled down not in the crazy notion of getting myself a Lambo, but because my family's lumber business was destroyed by the big banks and hedge funds, I saw my dad deteriorate and eventually pass away destitute...

When this GameStop think came up, I told myself I will hodl and keep buying, and I have... Just today, I've been laid off from my job. With many debts and bills, I had hoped that by now it would have gone to the stratosphere. I know a lot are going to berrate me and downvote me, but I have xxxx shares... In this moment of despair I feel I should cash out just to have money to survive in the next few months.

I sold everything else and had it all in GME. I wanted to somehow make something that I can save for my kids, right now looking at my tiny kids I'm very concerned by where this country is going, I was laid off due to not enough work coming the company's way.

Not the first time I've gone through this, but it's getting real difficult to find a job. Should I chance it and leave shares alone? Or should I just cash out and have something to fall back on? I see the crime these motherfuckers are doing every day... I wish we could stop them, but uncle Joe has destroyed the energy business. My family now needs money.
