In the event of the DTCC placing a chill or freeze on the trading of GME, it might be a good idea to seek alternative ways to trade DRS'd shares directly from Computershare. Since CS uses a third party broker to effectuate buys and sells, they would be unable to directly facilitate that during a chill/freeze. However, they might still be able to play a role, as an escrow between two parties. Who better to provide assurance that legitimate ownership is transferred, and payment received, than the very transfer agent responsible for maintaining the official record?

Would this work? I'm not entirely sure, to be honest. As far as I know, there is no legal restriction on direct sales of registered securities between two parties, even during a chill/freeze. While this comes uncomfortably close to discussing an "exit plan", I think it might be wise for apes to look into their options should the fuckery escalate.
