

Title: MOASS will *NOT* be triggered by price action. DRS is the only way to MOASS. MMs have too much power to manipulate the price. Only by locking tbr float will they have nowhere to hide. It's all in our hands now, apes. The end is in sight. Here's what happens now.

**EDIT: So after getting some pushback from arguments I didn't expect, I realize I was remiss in not including a HUGE piece of the puzzle as to *why* price action won't cause MOASS. I assumed people took this piece into account and I was harsher than I should have been in the comments. People have correctly pointed out that price action should trigger failed margin calls. The issue is that this thing has gotten so big that the firms doing the margin calls are likely exposed on the short side as well. Certainly their prime brokers are pressuring long firms to be lenient with margin calls ("owe the bank $100 you got a problem, owe the bank $100 million the bank's got a problem"). I strongly believe this is why we haven't seen those margin calls yet. DRS puts an end to these incestuous insider games. I apologize ~~if I was~~ because I was an asshole in the comments.**

Like the rest of you, I'm happy about Friday's close. But as a GME investor since 2020 like a lot of you, I'm all too familiar with brazen fuckery to think this signifies anything. I've seen some posts here lately from apes who've held as long or even longer than me expressing valid frustration with how long it's taking and the dearth of clear communication from Gamestop (though a well timed RC tweet 2 weeks ago hinted that he *was* paying attention). My next statement may be controversial, but it makes our journey all the more impressive.

===WITHOUT DRS CITADEL WOULD HAVE WON===

We've studied the DD for almost a year. We've known that this investment isn't just rational, it's *hyper rational* as one article put it. So we've put a lot of money into it. In many cases it was money that we may have been setting aside for a rainy day knowing it was in a safe place, knowing the hedgies couldn't carry the weight of those unrealized losses for that long. We saw the dirty tricks, but had no idea just how thoroughly corrupt the system was.

Our rallying cry that we could "stay retarded longer than they could stay solvent" was based on the premise that the FI's were required to make good on their financial obligations. But the price action since July proved that just how tight their grip on the price was (and by the laws of supply and demand, their unchecked ability to create synthetic shares).

And they're counting on dragging this out long enough for life to hit us in ways would effect us a lot differently than it would a rich HF manager. The car's going to need repair, the partner or spouse is ready to get out of the apartment and make the down payment on a house, fatigue from turning down purchases or vacations make people finally crack and sell. Just a little at first, of course, then a little more couldn't hurt, until enough people do it to put SHF in a position where closing or escaping at a low price is possible.

And it almost worked....

**"The Quest stands upon the edge of a knife. Stray but a little, and it will fail, to the ruin of all. Yet hope remains while the Company is true."***

During the January squeeze, the meme game was amazing. There were so many good ones, but for some reason my favorites came from Lord of the Rings, even though wasn't particularly partial to any of the source material for any of those memes. I liked *all* the references. But LOTR has proven to be a great analogy.

Much like Sauron, the powerful entities on the other side such as Citadel, Susquehanna, HF's, and the prime brokers can't be beaten in traditional battle (trading). They have too much control. In LOTR, only a practically suicidal quest to destroy the One Ring could defeat Sauron. In this saga, only an arcane and previously considered impossible goal to register every share of stock can defeat the shorts. But it's certain victory ~~if~~ when it succeeds.

Likewise, in LOTR, where destroying the ring was impossible for great warriors and godlike beings and so it took the lowly, simple hobbits to do it, no big FI's would consider doing this. They don't have the sense of justice and scrappiness the retail trader does. And like the Hobbits who had Aragorn, Gandalf, and the others, we have former big traders, insiders, and whistleblowers. And like in the books and movies, they've trained us to fight. But the quest is ultimately in the hands of retail. And we're well on our way.

So now that we've begun the process of DRS and do more and more every day, the LOTR analogy breaks. Because float locking is no longer a long shot, but an eventuality. A registered shareholder is owed a fiduciary duty by Gamestop. They can't allow more to be registered than there are in the float. If they **are** doing so, we have a right as shareholders to find out how many are registered. If we suspect for any plausible reason that our investment isn't being protected, we have legal recourse. I personally want to check on March 10th, plenty of time to DRS most of the float, and a reasonable goal for people to keep HODLing every share before the proverbial rainy day. And it's symbolically one year from the dirty $200 20 minute drop. Which personally made me feel even more violated than the buy button fraud in January.

====WHAT HAPPENS WHEN FLOAT IS LOCKED?====

There are, logically, 2 possibilities after a shares are locked and there are still shares in brokerages or available for purchase.

1. MOASS. When CALL shares in brokerage must be immediately purchased. The price skyrockets and all goes according to plan. Though I admit I'm sadly skeptical this continues without some kind of government intervention capping it out and paying us directly on some type of negotiated term. But it would need to be enough to salvage any scrap of faith in the system, which would be a lot.

2. Float registered and nothing happens or a forced liquidation of our stocks or a negotiated payout that's insulting low. This scenario portends far more worrisome implications than us not getting our tendies. Imagine the whole world sees a stock completely spoken for yet still being sold on the market.

**This** wouldn't fly under the radar. Everyone from Jon Oliver to Jimmy Kimmel to Joe Rogan to Charles Payne to Stephen Colbert to [several politicians, gotta be careful about using any politicians' names to avoid automod] and every voice with a platform and investments of any kind would howl.

The US market would be seen as so corrupt as to be useless. Not only eye-rollingly "oh all banker and politicians are dirty" corrupt, but so corrupt as to ensure no one ever invests another dime into this black hole. No IPO would take place here, no foreign pension would dream of parking their money here. Far more quickly than Wall Street became the financial capital of the world in 1914-18 it would lose that title. And likely it's attendant world power status.

The good news is that the US government letting all this come to pass is far less likely than the first possibility.

Buy. HODL. DRS. And victory is inevitable.
