So last week I went like every Friday to the main bar in Ritz Carlton, Manhattan to close the hard working week with a good drink. Just after I ordered a Yamasaki 35, which is one of my favorite whiskys, with it's wonderful flavor of the old oak barrel, the aftertaste of a dark chocolate like deep bitter flavor and it's hint of fresh moss from the Japanese forest where this golden liquor is coming from, at the counter, a middle aged man asked me: "How can you afford such a drink under these market conditions? I didn't have anything better than a Glenmorangie 18 since all went south more than half a year ago." I said, "Hahaha, my secret is owning negative beta." "Negative beta?" he replied. I explained him calmly "Yes there is one stock which is an unicorn in it's characteristics of it's extreme negative beta, the one stock which will protect you from the coming mother of all market crashes. I own a bunch of it so I'm not afraid, infact it's like winning the lottery every day since it's largely outperforming the S&P500; YTD" I could observe his hands becoming shaky, he replied, clearly with fear in his voice "The mother of all market crashes? They didn't tell me about that at my Goldman Sachs job, would you tell me which stock would protect me?" I told him with confidence "The one stock, which will bring down the entire financial system and greatly reward those who believe in the DD, those with real diamond hands is..." I paused for a moment to take a sip from my Yamazaki which arrived in the meanwhile "... it's GME, GameStop..." Suddenly the eyes of the man opened widely, looking scared like if he just saw in to the eyes of the death. And in the next split second he started screaming and ran out of the bar. Everyone around looked shocked, so I decided to leave, before people started asking questions. I quickly finished my drink and paid for me and for the dude who just ran out without paying. After that I just went home with the taxi, thinking about what just happened.
