The ultimate final battle?

I have been holding for about a year now, one thing that has always stood out to me is the prices that the shills always tried to push in to our heads.

I remember these specific FUD tweets that got very popular over here, the names of the people tweeting them were victims of a shooting, If I remember right. These were of course bottled accounts. Although we cannot point fingers and say that was 100% Citadel or Ken griffin, I believe that we can all agree on one thing; whoever bottled these accounts was seriously short GME and didn't want to lose all of their money.

Now, back to the prices. I remember the tweets saying something along the lines of "It's ridiculous if you think the price of GME will reach in to the millions. A more realistic price target is $13,000-$15,000."

What happened to these tweets? Why did they stop disappear all of a sudden? Because the only thing that happened from there on was that the floor increased. That tactic didn't work.

What can they do now? Well.. this is what I have seen. I have seen subtle messages in articles hinting that the real price of GME is about $30. I have also read articles that apparent Technical Analysts have written in, claiming the real price is also $30.

Why is this effective FUD? Because they aren't pushing it on to us so obviously, and haven't necessarily forced it on to us. They have nothing to lose now, because they have already lost it all so they will do anything to take back what is rightfully.. ours.

So from here on I don't care what anyone says, I think the price is getting pushed down even further, which is fucking great. Many more buying opportunities and a lot more time to increase the floor.

I am not even going to reread what I've written as I'm tired asf, sorry if there's any bad grammar or spelling mistakes lol.
