Funds trigger stop losses to help add additional downward pressure on $GME's share price, without funds having to expend additional resources. Funds are not in the habit of letting you know what they are planning, so why let them know what your plans are?

Lots of good things going on with GameStop now, and with earnings and the shareholder meeting next week, funds might well try to do what they normally do, try to get the price down leading up to earnings. Better to buy and hold than set stop losses.

Hope you have enjoy the show today.
