Netflix tanking, too many streaming apps.... Blockbuster the new aggregator streaming app?

So here's my take on the whole Blockbuster scenario. Shorted to shit... bankrupt but still somehow alive. Shorts might just be on the hook. Lets look at this and what Blockbuster could be with a digital transformation. I've put together the below and yes it's Saturday night and my wife is out with her boyfriend. Nice to have the piece and quiet...

Lets ask ourselves what was Blockbuster (yes we know, a so called dying brick and mortar) But what else was it? An aggregator of all the movie companies where you could rent their movies. Lets now parlay that into today's non-dying brick and mortar scenario with many (Too many streaming sites/apps). Could you align the industry of streaming movies, tv and music apps into one not so dying brick and mortar?

Is blockbuster alive?

There is one privately owned Blockbuster still in operation so it can't be dead totally and according to the cellar boxed liquidated BLIAQ stock and it's movement its not totally dead.

What if our "Chairman" is identifying all the shorted but not totally dead companies and finding the e-commerce values in them.

Using his boilerplate process and customer focused approach to raised them from the depths to come back to the surface stronger?

What if the shorts that shorted them could still be on the hook? That would be an absolute shitstorm...

Ok so I'm just some person that has lots of education, decades of corporate strategy, IT and marketing/advertising experience. I'm not an investing pro, but I have a few wrinkles.

RC goes after major opportunities where they seem impossible on the surface, knowing his style I wouldn't put this past him.

Ape's strong, GME to the moon.
