For over 18 months now, I've been talking to all my friends about A-M-C/GME. I'll start of with 'this is not financial advise', but then continue to give updates on the stock movement and theories around M-O-A-S-S.

I usually send these via text messages every 10-20 days. Most include links to articles or YouTube videos. A lot of it goes over their head, but I believe most are appreciative that they get consistent information.

I sent out a message yesterday. A portion of it appears below.

"So... since many thought that my previous updates were complicated or hard to follow, I'm not going to even try to explain this one.

The story involves tweet a about General Tso Chicken, the (do not play for 100 years) Wu-Tang Clan album, expensive/exclusive whiskey, a stock split and over priced anti-malaria medication from Martin Shkreli."

I sound like a crazy person... absolutely nuts. Read it again. I am suggesting people invest money based on that shit. I was then wondering if this is how people get caught in cults. In retrospect, the insanity is obvious, but at the time, it makes perfect sense. All of my updates indicate that you should run far away from me... but then, I'm so invested that it would be devastating if it all were a lie.

I'm not a sh-ill. I believe the original premise. I went YOLO 18+ months ago. I'm still green. I'm not selling... but I have to admit that this is beyond just being retarded.
