They designed this "Stock Market" game to be played a certain way which allowed them to always win.

They wrote the code so that it could be abused in their favor.

They wrote the rules to be similarly abused. Not all of them, but just enough.

When they broke those rules to benefit further, they installed and controlled the enforcement mechanisms so that the "punishment" wasn't even that.

They made the game seem hopelessly yet also needlessly complicated. They offered to play the game for you, but they made sure that you didn't win. Not like they do. You were only really there to pad their stats.

As long as everyone played the game by their rules, they would win.

We saw how they were playing the game and decided to jump in. We saw flaws in their strategies, and we designed our own strategies to target their weaknesses.

They had grown complacent, having always won. When we started playing and winning, they cried FOUL. They screamed that we were idiots for playing this way. They even claimed that we were cheating, when in fact they were the ones who were cheating all along.

They paid "celebrities" to tell the world how dumb we were to play the game in this way. They mocked us. They ridiculed us. They laughed, albeit nervously.

We kept playing our way though, because we were persistent. We knew that we were right. We knew that the enemy would fight hardest the closer we were to our objective.

We are still playing. The princess is always in another castle, and we keep going until the final boss.

We know what it looks like when the game is won. We know how it feels.

The game is still on. The credits haven't rolled. We keep playing.

We.

Keep.

Playing.
