Well, this was a fun call. As soon as the trade rep answered the phone (he knew I was transferring shares), his first question was: "Okay, what are we DRS'ing today? GME or A\C?"

I chuckled and replied "Actually, both, though I was originally just calling for GME" (200 more inbound btw, going into XXXX territory + another direct CS buy to settle soon)

The rep was 100% on our side. Told me straight up that he's putting skin in the game as well and that the hedge funds are "getting what they deserve after decades of manipulating markets and crushing companies".

The one thing I found strange was that he simply could not* wrap his mind around the short situation concept. He kept saying that there was finite limit to what the shares could ever be worth, and assumed that the "cap" was $400 per the previous spike (before crime algo's took over).

I walked him through the synthetics, closing positions out, buying back fake shares prior to being able to go after our real shares, their short positions remaining, borrow rate soaring... and how these elements could all skyrocket the remaining legitimate shares to staggering heights. He thought about it for awhile and then said, "Yeah, I suppose if the hedge funds are that exposed and everything they are doing is to suppress the price... maybe there really is no cap on these?"

Super nice guy. Was refreshing to talk to a fellow Ape (or semi-Ape) on the other end of the line during a DRS request.

Just wanted to share.
