... OF COURSE they are colluding.

Wall Street isn't a bunch of individuals working separately. It's an arena of high-power, high-ego white collar criminals who all run in the same social circles. While they compete bitterly with each other, they also team up on certain plays.

GME is a massive, existential threat to their entire business and way of life. And that doesn't just go for the short sellers. The whole industry — money, politics, the rest — is built around this current clock, which is getting unwound as we speak. And that's not just for these specific short sellers. It affects everyone. You know how many regulators jump ship from the SEC or DOJ to these cushy hedge fund positions? A whole lot. They have no reason to "do their jobs" — because their position at the SEC is essentially an apprenticeship for a hedge fund job, which pays a ton more. No one wants to piss off the street and get blacklisted.

They're going to work together. They're going to do everything in their power to stop this. We're going to see such blatant criminality it'll be surreal, because to them, this is everything. This business is their whole life. Worth millions and 80 hours a week at the office, wife and kids and dinner left out cold.
