Back in late summer, before I checked out of here for a while, I said something like: "I'm no mathematician, but I can see that the highs are getting lower and lower, and eventually we are going to get to a point where the hedgies can't drop it, the apes can't raise it, so everyone is just going to truly trade sideways."

We're there, with the new Battle For 100 (remember the Battle For 180?), unless either DRS blows this wide open, or Gamestop makes an announcement that drives FOMO. I suspect the latter will not happen, as most investors I know now consider GME toxic. I really don't know if the general public will buy into FOMO at this point--too many have been burned already in the past year. Only apes will FOMO, and many are tapped out (props to all of you who aren't, and continue to buy, hodl and DRS).

What can we do?

I hope DRS makes a difference, but not all apes can or will DRS, and the implications of a DRS-caused squeeze are still unknown.

However, I will once again state my unpopular opinion: The company needs to prove to apes that they are more than bagholders in a pissing match between various mega-financiers. I've read all the DD that says moonlanding is impossible to avert, but I also know there's nothing forcing the US financial sheriffs to do what's right--they haven't so far. So, to many, GME needs to prove it is a sensible investment without rocket trips. I'm just not seeing that. All I see are poop and sex tweets. Thanks a lot, guys. I hope Q4 results are good, but given the attacks at previous earnings reports, it seems silly to expect positive press (resulting in Main Street purchasing the stock) as a result.

So. Get ready for the battle for $100. We will continue to buy, and the hedgies will continue to pull shares out of thin air and use them to screw us.

(I'd be very happy to be proved wrong, though!)
