So this is my first attempt at posting. And everything I mention henceforth is simply my opinion after watching the various popcorn and gaming boards these past 15-months. I'm a GME holder since Jan '21 with mid-XXX shares and growing.

I like the stonk and will re-invest post-MOASS based on that same conviction.

HOWEVER, if there is anything we should have learned this past year (or more) is that, we have very little control over either of these stocks. Frankly, as the shareholder count has grown, we have even less impact on the overall share price. Regardless of all the "DD", "TA", lines, theories, etc... we are not impacting the daily, weekly or monthly movement of either of these stocks. Although there is a tremendous amount of work going into all of this, at the moment it only serves as confirmation bias.

So....., how and why did GME move when RC bought?

Again, why did the share price move when RC bought?

<<<>>>

Surely there have been 100,000 shares purchased by retail in a single day, right?

I am certain we are overlooking / missing something critical.

- Was it the timing? Time of Day? The exchanges? The amounts?

Of Course, DRS is a vital piece to the puzzle. I view DRS as a tool that enables GME to take action... categorized as third-party evidence, unquestionably highlighting the short-comings of an outdated securities "oversight" system.

So, I have more questions than answers.

- (1) Why did the trades RC performed move the share price, while the daily retail volume does not?
- (2) Is there ANY variable-weighting to share purchases via CS (Com-poo-terd-share) over any other exchange/broker?
- (3) Is there any other reason why DRS is important?

Thanks for reading - I'm drunk as fuck right now - so I'm glad shell-peck is working.

Of course, nothing here is Financial Advice FFS.

TLDR;

Why did GME move when RC bought, while retail share purchases does very little? Are we as a community more focused a new TA, DD or theory(s) rather than investigating what is in right in-front of us?
