GME management might've already done a share buyback because there was a massive single block buy order of 735,000 shares (which is quite unusual) on 1/6 or 1/7 iirc.

With $100mil available to GME to buyback shares-

$$100\text{M} / 735,000 = \text{avg share cost of } \sim \136 (which is relatively close to the price at that time)

Of course this is purely speculation until GME announces it themselves but I think it's a tit-jacking theory worthy of some ■■■■■
