

Title: Financial analyst thinks we should avoid GME. They all seem to lack financial experience and are primarily writers don't they?

Conclusion: Meme Stocks Should Probably be Avoided Altogether

If comparing the original meme stock with the mob's new favorite reveals anything, it should be that stocks that earn meme status generally should be avoided. It can be exciting to hitch a ride to the clouds, but investors who weren't the ones driving the original rise via social media should be wary. The bottom can fall out at any time, and if there's no cash to cushion the company's fall, investors will go down with it.

Ultimately, it's hard to find anything to like about GameStop. While bankruptcy may not look as imminent as it did before it gained meme-stock status, the company is losing money at such a rapid clip that it's hard to imagine that it has many more years left without a major overhaul of its business model.

The only good news for GameStop is its balance sheet, which shows $1.035 billion in cash and equivalents with $617 million in debt (when including lease obligations) and $1.67 billion in total liabilities. Retail investors have given the company so much money over the last couple of years that it was able to raise $1.68 billion by selling more shares to shore up its balance sheet.

GameStop has been trying to reinvent itself, starting with the addition of Chewy (CHWY) co-founder Ryan Cohen as chairman of its board in June 2021. However, the retailer's future is far from a sure thing, so at this point, its valuation hinges on the whims of the masses, making it impossible to predict its price movement.

On Wall Street, GameStop has a Moderate Sell consensus rating based on zero Buys, one Hold, and one Sell rating assigned over the last three months. At $17.50, the average GameStop price target implies downside potential of 52%.

The investing world has gone through significant changes over the last two or three years. One of the most significant changes has been the addition of meme stocks. In this piece, we used TipRanks' Comparison Tool to evaluate two meme stocks — GME and BBBY. The two companies share many similarities. However, there is one critical difference between these two that makes BBBY look shakier than GME.
