Imagine you are Matt Furlong. As GME CEO you keep in hand all strings and handles.
You get paid mainly in shares.

You have dedicated investors base ready to support you.

Now, what do you choose: VW spike or Tesla steady rise?

In VW scenario most investors sell off at some time, everybody is making quick buck, pressure is released, and you are back in square one.

Or you keep pressure building up as price steady rises. HFs suffer, nobody sells any significant numbers - who sells when price is rising? Greed and FOMO does not allow. Insiders are even more happy.

Where do you think the board is steering?
