The answer is so simple, yet so disgusting. Their world is one laced with delusions of grandeur. They believe they are smarter, more deserving, and superior in all aspects when compared to "common folk". They are raised and nurtured in this delusional paradise from youth. They grow into adulthood with this cemented into the core of their existence and then strike out to find jobs that FIT their existing unalterable status, as opposed to finding a career that BUILDS their societal status. Their measurement of status is an even bigger issue, but more on that later.

Wall Street is filled to the brim with individuals so entrenched in this. They are in their own society, separate of the same requirements like "job performance". When their job performance is clearly warranting removal or disciplinary action, their reaction is defensive. They do what everyone else in their world did whenever there was trouble of their own doing -- they dampen the efforts of disciplinarians rather than correcting the root cause. "I don't deserve those consequences."

You don't have to be wrong if you can just change laws. You don't have to face public backlash if you can purchase news outlets and spin the narrative. "We're beyond all of that".

There is equal fault here, though. We fail as a society when wealth is championed over things like justice, honor, and respect. These get labeled as chintzy or childish, when in reality these are the very skeleton that all societies have been built upon. You can destroy wealth instantly, but killing an idea takes near impossible amounts of effort. America has been working hard for generations to dismantle the championing of values, and when that is successful you have law enforcement that wants a $25M yacht instead of being the person who ripped Wall Street leeches off the neck of the country. Furthermore the gap between legal and ethical widens more and more with every passing year.

This brings me to my true point of this post today. This doesn't stop with achieving MOASS, cashing out, and walking away. Apes possess values this country needs that also require continuous nurturing to avoid the next layer of scum from inheriting Wall Street and law enforcement like the SEC. We need to raise our children to understand that wealth means nothing without honor, and that justice without consequences is simply enablement.

Yes, buy lambo. But also plan for how those tendies can stop the cycle that got us here to begin with. GameStop is backed by gamers, and gamers are some of the most focused and disciplined individuals in the world. If anyone is going to do it, I think it'll be us.
