Just watched Moneyball for the third or fourth time, but this time the owner of the Red Sox trying to Convince Billy Beane that he was onto something caught my ear.

 "I know you're taking it in the teeth out there, but the first guy through the wall, he always gets bloody, always. This is threatening, not just a way of doing business, but in their minds, it's threatening the game. But really what it's threatening is their livelihoods, it's threatening their jobs, it's threatening the way that they do things. And every time that happens, whether it's the government or a way of doing business or whatever it is, the people who are holding the reins, have their hands on the switch. They will go bat crazy. I mean, anybody who's not building a team right now and rebuilding it using your model, they're dinosaurs."*

Makes sense. And it's a homerun (ba-dum-dush) in my eyes. Someone that is too used to be winning made a bad bet against this company that suddenly got a guy with a vision that do not care what the "regular way" is. RC wants to change Gamestop, because he BELIEVE in it and the potential the market has. And he has been right before, the way he did it with Chewy.

And there is a lot of people that would disagree, because this is gonna get them caught red-handed with a bad bet AND potentially change the game they've been playing, winning and running for MANY years. But also because it is different. And probably gonna change things for many businesses.

Enjoy the weekend - believe the man, the company and his vision.

Buy, HODL, DRS!
