

Title: Genuine question for a smooth brain. Why is it that we expect to moon when the market crashes?

Long time XXX holder and occasional lurker. First time poster. This will probably get downvoted to oblivion, but hopefully not. Can someone smarter than me please explain? Or point me in the right direction to the proper DD?

I keep seeing posts about how "they" are tanking the price. Fair enough, I get that apes aren't selling. But I can't help but think GME is just tanking along with the rest of the market right now. And it seems like this monster market disaster is right around the corner. So why is it that we MOASS when everything else collapses? Beeeecause.....negative beta? Is that still a thing?

Trust me, these hands are diamond, and yeah, everyone on the front page is buying the dip which is great. But there is a silent majority, are they just as excited about a "juicy dip"? Maybe, maybe not? If someone can shed some light on this, then maybe they will be!

I'm averaged in at sub 50$, with most of my net worth in GME. I have a mortgage, wife, and kid on the way. I understand that the price probably doesn't matter, I try not look at it too often, but hey, we're emotional beings, and its not easy to watch my account plummet thousands on top of thousands everyday. Especially when a recession or worse may be coming.

If someone could give me (and most likely many other lurkers in the same boat as me) some insight as to why posts that sound excited about an imminent financial disaster are so common? What is the relationship between the rest of the market and GME? And why is it good for us?

Some visibility on this would be great I think! It could really help in these red times.

Thanks.
