If it isn't obvious by now, market makers and their hedge fund buddies have unleashed what potentially seems like a coordinated attack via shorting of retail favorite stocks over the past few weeks. None of what has unfolded recently makes any sense - i.e., treasury yields have never went parabolic as they just have before the Fed barely even had a chance to hike fed fund rates (appears to me that algos were deployed to run yields up). Yields (as well as the USD) behaving this way seems unnatural and is unprecedented, yet that was then used to justify the massive sell off in stocks, which I believe occurred due to short sellers forcing widespread margin calls. It's been quite a wild set of events but the time is ticking for these actors to cover their short positions because many experienced investors know the market has most likely bottomed and we are potentially going to reach new highs. I think going into next week there will be many major short squeezes as these players rush to cover and switch their portfolio positions to net long. Don't let them off easy folks...I'm holding positions in HYMC, BE, MSTR, BTBT, HUT, SLNH, BKKT but also like GME right now.
