*EDIT: Does anyone know what the signal is that feeds charts out across all tracking apps & sites? And who is responsible for feeding it out (and has ability to cut it off)? If we could ID those things, maybe there's a way to watch for when the signal is up & when it's down, which could be a very telling indicator in and of itself... Knowing these pieces of info could also create an incredible opportunity to shine the bright light of accountability on this bullshit by encouraging key entities to sit up and answer for it every time it happens, the same way following the money back up to its source brings shady shit to light.*

***[ORIGINAL POST STARTS HERE:]***

- * Right when GME is going on a *just-up* 6% run, and charts across the market are unavailable...
- * The S&P; 500 has massive 3.474 Billion spike, then drops to 711.1 right as the chart comes back
- * BUT...the S&P; 500 Daily Average jumps from 3.573B to 3.614B ***and stays there?***

Ok...I'm no quant, but I can tell you this with certainty:

Daily Average Volume DOES NOT GO UP BY 41 MILLION ON A FUCKING VOLUME DROP OF 2.7629 BILLION

**HERE'S THE VIDEO:**

Here's the very moment the volume was changing back to 711.1 Million, as the chart magically becomes available again:
