So we all know that GameStop insiders aren't selling, 100s of posts to remind us. But what about insider buys...hmmm none of those either...so isn't that bearish? NOT to me, I believe it is bullish.

Insiders have strict rules to follow, some include blackouts periods set around release of financial reports, but more importantly in this scenario is that all insider trades usually require pre-clearance from someone or a department in the company, usually the legal or risk department.

This is done so insiders cannot make trades based on their insider knowledge which the public doesn't have. In this case, C suite and other ranking exec's cannot buy because they know something big is coming that will impact the company.

To this ape, no insider activity at all is super bullish. ■■■■
