Which of course they beat back down in the AH and PM to avoid the possibility of anyone exercising options. They were on the edge of the cliff and got bailed out. CitiGroup missed their estimated EPS by almost 25% while JPM beat theirs by 10% and Wells Fargo by 30%. So don't believe the BS Citadel articles spinning their $1.15b cash infusion from Sequoia as the final piece to their "deathstar" to fight against JPM.

Research who actually owns the CC's you use, the bank you use, any financial service and boycott everything Citadel owns a piece of. I recently switched my business CC from Capital One because I finally realized they are owned by CitiBank. Capital One is one of the EASIEST CC's to get and often the very first one an 18 year old will get. Somehow you can get your hands on a CC while you are UNDER 18 on occasion! I was approved shortly after turning 16 and my younger siblings in the younger half of their teen years constantly received "pre-approved" CC offer's in the mail. This was early 2000's so I'm sure the financial crime was in the process of building up to it's peak before 08.

Prepare for a GME price hammering. Do what you already know and remove all buy/sell stops, buy the dips you can afford, DRS, HODL and go about your life without even thinking about it. You lose nothing until you sell.

It's just a waiting game at this point and it costs you nothing to hold. Just remember not to over extend yourself and only buy what you can afford. Consider it money that you spent on an event or a drunken night of coke and whores, it's gone.

The day will come when you wake up to a surprise beyond your wildest dreams.
