I just wanted to make this post to the original GME subreddit that I ever followed. Back before the migration to Superstonk. Back when we had no idea how dark pools worked. Back when we had no idea about married puts or conversions. Back before we found they were shorting through ETFs. Back before Pixels quad witching 'DD' with 100% chance of squeeze. Back before anyone really had any idea of what the fuck was going on.

It's New Years. I'm drunk and it's been more than a full year now that I've been balls deep in GME. Studying every DD that's come across the subreddits. Doing my own research. Seeing absolutely countless hype dates that have come and gone with no price action.

I'm keeping my XXX shares as a constant reminder of this past year. Of the details I've learned about the markets from u/dlauer. From past naked short experiences and cases from Lucy and Wes. To seeing first hand how communities could be hijacked and manipulated or fall victim to forum sliding. How the stock market isn't a place for movements. How robinhood shut down the buy button with no repercussions. How a company could be sold short over 100 percent and the worst that happens to them is they're fined a few thousand dollars. How easy it is to get swiped up in communities that turn into echo chambers and spout their tin foil theories as fact, how in the end...

It was all a learning experience. I'm going to continue to hold my shares more of a reminder, not for the hopes of a squeeze, because this year has been the most significant year for me in the markets in terms of what I've learned and how truly insane everything truly is.

May tendies find you all, and may reason and logic and critical thinking bless you all.

Happy New Years.
