Had a chat with CS. If you place a limit sell CS allocates these shares to BofA to execute the order. They effectively sit in a bucket that BofA has permission to access until the order is executed or it gets cancelled. So if the ask price for GME is really high, then the likelihood of that order being fulfilled is going to be low. But it still sits in a bucket that BofA can play with. So technically BofA can play with these shares for as long as they want so long as they can fulfill the order. The upshot is that limit sells give MMs access to these shares. Maybe that's why everyone was happy to increase the cap for limit sells because it effectively allows them to legitimately gain access to shares, DRSD or not.

DRS. HODL.
